

Of Interest to Women.

BEAKING THE RECORD.

BY JEANNE CALDWELL.

Again, and especially glad to have the first chance to thank him for his tour of duty which I borrowed so unceremoniously this afternoon.

"And my chauffeur?"

At sound of his voice Miss Carleton looked around as if for support, but host and hostess had drifted away.

"I thought—"

"Of course," he said with a quizzical laugh, "it has been five years since last we met—and then there were the goggles." He was looking at her hair. "I think I

DR. DAVIS WILL KNOW HE'S MARRIED

Kind Friends Decorate Office of Dentist Who is on Wedding Trip.

When Dr. H. W. Davis, a well-known Salt Lake dentist, returns with his bride this week from his wedding trip, he will meet a series of joyful surprises. These will greet him probably from the time he reaches the city; but their climax will occur when he comes to the station platform.

Dr. Davis made the mistake of trying to get married without the knowledge of his friends. That has been tried before with consequences more or less disastrous, but in no case more amusing for everyone but the bridegroom, than in this. When Dr. and Mrs. Davis left Salt Lake about a month ago they realized that their friends had "gotten next," and so did many others on the station platform. Probably the dentist thinks it is all over now, but he'll learn differently when he comes to the station platform.

Pedestrians on First South yesterday saw men and women on the curb with uplifted eyes and upturned faces; and following such example, as human beings invariably do, got something in the way of a sensation. From the third-story windows, which are usually adorned only with the signs of Dr. Davis, floated streamers, banners, and two large red-lettered signs, the latter each bearing the words "Just Married."

A baby carriage occupied one of the window seats.

In the hallway occasional Sunday afternoon visitors to the McCormick block gathered in groups and laughed. The place looked as though it had been fitted up for a party. Old shoes hung everywhere. But a couple of scores of placards formed a composite main center of attraction.

"You Will Get Married and Say Nothing About It!"

This sign told the whole story. "I Don't Care if I Never Come Back." "Have You Seen Doc? He's Married." "I Am a Foxy Boy, Nite." "They Gave Us All the Way." "Did You See Us Leave Town on the Quiet?" "Everyone on the Train Was Next." These were among the others. And right over the door some kind friends had hung a diminutive pink undershirt and a pair of infant's stockings, beneath which was printed in bold and obtrusive letters, "To Little Harry, From His Friends and Relatives."

Inside the offices rice crunched beneath the feet of those who entered. Rice was in the dental chair. The little swinging shelf that usually bears the forceps, mallet and other instruments of torture, which Dr. Davis usually keeps handy—in fact, rice was all over the place, except where the old shoes and the signs were suspended.

A large array of jokes, bearing the legend, "For Old Time's Sake," occupied a conspicuous position. All the pictures in the room were turned toward the wall, and a red wedding bell hung from the chandelier and was surrounded by a rampant rooster.

"Rent a High Better Board." "What Is Home Without Babies?" "Girl Wanted," and some fifty paper sacks of junk labeled "Candy for Little Harry," adorned the walls.

Dr. Davis was married July 22, to Mrs. Minnie Leason. Both are widely known in Salt Lake.

WOMAN BEHEADS SNAKE.

Cuts Serpent's Head Off With Sickle After Several Efforts.

POTTSVILLE, Pa., Aug. 21.—When Mrs. E. E. Boyer of this place went to make the rice in the kitchen range yesterday she was startled by an angry hiss at her feet. Stepping back, she narrowly avoided a large black snake which writhed across the floor.

She was frightened nearly out of her wits, and backed toward the cellar door, not knowing how to give battle. Then, remembering that there was a sickle in the cellar, she secured it and attacked the snake.

It did not retreat even after she had made a sweep with the sharp blade, taking off part of its tail. The fight continued for several minutes, until Mrs. Boyer, by a lucky swing of the sickle, cut off the reptile's head.

The snake is supposed to have crawled from a mass of rank vegetation near the house, through the open door, and to have coiled itself beneath the stove.

L. of Boise, Idaho; Emma Moore, Eugene Kane, Herman Gordon, P. H. Hopkins, P. H. Hopkins, Moss Wolf, Wertheimer, Butte, Mont.; Franklin, Herbert Schiller, Fred L. Rain Puts Out Forest Fires.

KALISPEL, Mont., Aug. 21.—A heavy rain fell yesterday, the first of any consequence in the past two months. The downpour aided materially in helping to extinguish the forest fires which have been raging in northern Montana for the past ten days. The outlook is for more rain. Stockmen are rejoicing over the storm, as stock has been in distress as the result of the great scarcity of water, the watering holes in the majority of instances being dry. The rain comes too late, however, to do any good to the hay and grain crops. Half accompanied the rain, Missoula and vicinity were also visited by a rainstorm yesterday, which helped to check the spread of the forest fires there.

UTAH STATE PRISON QUITE UP TO DATE

Warden Pratt Compares Our Penitentiary With One at San Quentin.

"San Quentin prison, the larger of the California State penitentiaries, which holds 1482 prisoners, is not as modern as our own pen," says Warden Pratt, who has just returned from a visit to the largest penal establishment in the West.

"We have only 122 prisoners here, although we could accommodate many more. And compared with our establishment, the San Quentin prison shows up as being behind the times.

"For one thing, they crowd their prisoners considerably. In some cells they have as many as four and five convicts. We never put more than one in a cell. The advantage we have in that point is shown by the exceedingly small amount of illness we have. Within the last five months we have only had one patient in the hospital for sickness.

"Another point where we have the advantage over them is that every cell here is lighted by electricity. All of their cells have oil lamps. The shops and the main body of the prison are lighted by more modern methods, but the cells are not so well fixed up.

"Yes, you would think it was dangerous, but they don't seem to have any bad consequences from it. I'm not familiar with the state of their monthly health reports, but I hardly think they can make such a good showing as ours.

"Punishments reserved to in California are much heavier than the ones inflicted at the Utah penitentiary. About the worst thing they have is the straight jacket and dungeon combined. We have a dark cell, very much the same as theirs, but we don't put them in the straight jacket. When the prisoners are enclosed in that they can hardly move. They lace them up so tight that their arms are confined strictly to their sides, and the effect of this restriction, besides being in the dungeon, makes it an awful infliction for any one to bear."

The only point wherein the San Quentin prison has the better of the establishment on Twelfth South is in the warden's residence. Formerly the Lieutenant-Governor of the State was ex-officio warden of San Quentin, and an almost palatial residence was erected for him, says Warden Pratt.

Another point of difference between the San Quentin penitentiary and the Utah State prison is that in the latter the convicts are graded, whereas in California no distinction is made. When a man first comes to the Utah pen, he is put into the second class. If his conduct is good, he is promoted to the first grade, commonly known as the trustees. If he is a turbulent individual, he is turned down to the third grade, which has very few privileges. For one thing, the prisoners in this class have no access to the library, as they are confined all the time.
